President of CREPUQ. On October 2, 2008, executive heads and board chairs from all universities met with Minister Courchesne, and communicated a consensus in opposing elements of the proposed legislation that would have impeded good governance, or failed to respect the autonomy of universities and their particular missions, traditions, values and customs. Following this meeting a consensus response to the Minister from CREPUQ was developed. The tabling of legislation is anticipated early in the fall session of the National Assembly. On the invitation of the Chair, Ms. Bishop asked the following question:

BACKGROUND:

McGill University prides itself on being a global leader in post-secondary education. Our degrees are highly respected worldwide due to our reputation for academic excellence.

In light of the recent publicity related to the Academic Integrity Policy and its application at McGill University, it seems that the Code of Student Conduct and Disciplinary Procedures and its day-to-day implementation have not consistently maintained international leadership standards.

Professor Butler asked what the deficit would be under the new accounting procedures. Mr. Caponi explained that by going to a full accrual basis of accounting, all true liabilities would have to be recorded, which would increase the amount. Professor Butler then asked if McGill would still be held to the three-year turnaround. Mr. Caponi answered that this was currently under discussion with the Ministry.

Professor Zorychta wanted to know if the difference between academic and support staff salaries had changed much over the years with regards to the breakdown of total expenditures. Mr. Caponi replied that these numbers were fairly stable, although there could be some variation from year to year. The Provost added that there had been a gap between 1999, when academic renewal was first announced, and 2003, when the process of non-academic renewal began, but that gap is narrowing.

Professor Jonsson wondered how the amounts for academic salaries and administrative and support salaries had grown relative to each other, percentage-wise, over the years. Mr. Caponi replied that he did not have that data, but would provide it to Senate at a future meeting. Professor Jonsson then asked how the salaries of members of the administration who also hold academic appointments are accounted for, whether they were split between the two areas or left in the academic area. The Provost explained that there was a process by which the academic salary was absented, with a portion left with the academic unit, but the full burden of the salary was on the administrative side. In the case of Deans and Chairs, these salaries stay in their own faculties.

Ms. Cooke asked if it would be possible to break down the percentages of administrative and support staff between those at departmental levels and upper administration levels. The Provost said that they would bring back a report on this and the previous request at the same time.
